Non-stationary phenomena during passage through critical speeds have been studied since Lewis (1932) reported his investigation on the Jeffcott rotor

Many practical rotors, especially those being designed for aircraft gas turbines, were not suitable for a Jeffcott model. For one thing, the distinction between disk and shaft is blurred in the typical aircraft gas turbine

The method of Holzer (1921) for torsional vibrations was of this type. Engineers could apply this method using only a slide rule. A more general modeling technique was needed. This was supplied by Prohl in the late 1930s and published in 1945 for critical speed evaluation of turbine shaft

The most important and fundamental procedure to reduce unfavourable vibrations is to eliminate geometric imbalance in the rotor. The balancing procedure for a rigid rotor was established relatively early

The initial application of these codes to rotor dynamics was based on the TMM method but in the 1970s another underlying algorithm, the FEM, became available for the solution of the prevailing beam-based models.

The tools are therefore still more advanced than the techniques, and there are three technical areas that must be addressed for effective fault diagnosis using vibration condition and fault mechanism, modification of signal transmission paths, and signal analysis
